Trivia team names for kids: 40 funny, kind names (and a generator)

Peabody blog · Games · updated 2026-11-06

Forty trivia team names for kids and families that are funny, kind and never a real team's, plus a free generator that makes three more with every tap.

A good trivia team name for kids is short, says itself out loud easily, and makes the other teams laugh rather than wince. The trick most hosts use is alliteration: two words that start with the same letter, like the Quizzical Quokkas or the Brainy Badgers. Below are forty names in four themes, and Peabody's team name generator makes three more with every tap. Like the rest of Peabody, it's free through the end of 2026, with nothing to sign up for.

Animal team names

- The Brainy Badgers
- The Quizzical Quokkas
- The Clever Cheetahs
- The Wise Wombats
- The Puzzling Penguins
- The Daring Dolphins
- The Lucky Lemurs
- The Fearless Flamingos
- The Witty Walruses
- The Mighty Meerkats

Space team names

- The Cosmic Comets
- The Starry Stars
- The Galactic Geniuses
- The Mega Moons
- The Radiant Rockets
- The Lunar Llamas
- The Twinkling Telescopes
- The Orbiting Otters
- The Solar Squirrels
- The Astro Astronauts

Food team names

- The Crunchy Cookies
- The Cheesy Chips
- The Saucy Spaghetti
- The Nutty Noodles
- The Popping Popcorn
- The Juicy Jellybeans
- The Toasty Tacos
- The Wondering Waffles
- The Peppery Pickles
- The Sweet Smoothies

Brainy team names

- The Fact Finders
- The Know-It-Owls
- The Question Marks
- The Smarty Pants
- The Thinking Caps
- The Answer Ants
- The Brain Trust
- The Clue Crew
- The Puzzle Pieces
- The Curious Cats

How to pick one without an argument

Give each team two minutes. Each player suggests one name; the team votes. If there's a tie, the youngest player chooses. If nobody can think of anything, tap the generator three times and vote between the nine names.

A few rules keep it kind: no name that teases another team, no real sports team names, and nothing a grandparent would mind hearing read out.

Then play

Make a round with Peabody's round maker: pick the ages and three themes, and get ten questions with three answers each, read aloud. Keep score on the scoreboard, and if you want more ideas for the evening, read how to host a kids' trivia night. For a quiet night after, Peabody's library has stories at every reading level.

Names for a classroom

In a class, team names do a second job: they make teams easy to call on and score. A few ideas that work well for teachers:

- Name teams after something you're studying. The Mighty Mammals, the Volcanic Vowels, the Fraction Friends. Pick from the unit's vocabulary and the names double as review.
- Use table colours or shapes. The Red Rockets, the Blue Bananas, the Square Squirrels: easy to remember when the tables are already labelled.
- Keep the same names all term. A running scoreboard on the wall builds a little friendly rivalry that lasts.

Names for a family night

At home, mixed-age teams work best: a grown-up and a child on each side. Let the youngest player choose the name, and the oldest player read the questions. A few families keep the same team names year after year and write the winners on a list on the fridge.

If the names get silly, that's fine. A team called the Toasty Tacos is far more likely to laugh after a wrong answer, and a laughing team keeps playing.

Questions grown-ups ask

Why alliteration?

Two words that start with the same sound are easy for young children to say and remember, and they sound like a team name. It also makes the host's job fun: "and the points go to... the Puzzling Penguins!"

Do the generator's names ever repeat a real team?

No. The words come from lists Peabody wrote, and the tests check that the combinations don't make a known team name.

Can kids type their own name into it?

No. Nothing is typed and nothing is sent: a tap picks from the lists. A team that has its own idea just writes it on the scoreboard.

What makes a good team name for a big group?

Short and easy to shout. Three or four syllables is plenty; the host will say it a lot.

Free at peabody.kids/blog/trivia-team-names-for-kids