Would you rather questions for kids: 40 silly, gentle questions with two choices each, like a pet dragon or a pet unicorn. Read one out, everyone picks, and each player says why. There are no wrong answers and no points. Print them for the table or the classroom, or tap through them one at a time, free.

Three ways to use them

- Where: At the table · How: Read one out, everyone picks, and each person says why. · Open: The cards on this page
- Where: In the car · How: Peabody reads each question aloud and shows two boxes to point at. It works in the dark. · Open: Would You Rather in the car
- Where: In class · How: Spin for a question, vote with your feet, then two students from each side explain why. · Open: Would you rather wheel

Why the "why" matters

The choice takes a second. The reason is the point: "I would rather have a dragon because it could fly us home" is a child giving an opinion and backing it up, which is the start of persuasive writing. Ask why every time.

Make your own

A good question has two choices that are both fun or both a bit silly. Leave out anything that would scare a little one, and anything about real people in the room.
